THE O'CONNELL
CENTENARY CELEBRATION

This demonstration in connection with the centenary anniversary of the birth of Dr. David Evans, Dr. the "Glasgow 'Irish Liberator,'" took place yesterday, and was in every way an unqualified success. Not only was the demonstration joined in by hundreds of all ranks of society, and from all parts of the colony, but Englishmen, Scotchmen, and all nationalities represented in the colony, assembled to do honour to the hero of the cause, and his fellowship to do honour to the memory of the man whom the natives of the Emerald Isle regarded as one of their truest patriots, and in every respect foremost among their greatest men. It is very gratifying to be able to state that the procession, about which such gloomy forebodings were expressed, was a complete success, and that with peace, passed off in the most satisfactory manner, without causing the slightest expression of ill-will or bad feeling. It is evident from what took place on this occasion that the colonists of New South Wales are too liberal in their notions, and too much imbued with the spirit of order, to be so easily misled by the passions of a few fanatical colonists striving to do honour to the memory of a man whom they may esteem; and the whole proceedings of the day reflect credit alike upon the manner in which the demonstration was carried out on the one hand, and upon the good feeling actuating the combining part of the consumers of the day on the other. The affair was a great success, and highly creditable to those who had the management of it.

The procession fell in at the open space between the District Court and St. James's Church, near Hyde Park. There had been a ballot for places at the committee meeting held on Wednesday evening, and the order of programme then adopted was strictly adhered to. The first body to move forward was the Holy Catholic Guild, including the colony branches and numbering about seven to eight hundred. Next came the Labouring Men's Association, followed by the Hibernian and the Benefit Society. These were succeeded by the Labouring Men's Union, the Seamen's Union, and the St. Francis Temperance Society. Next came the Christian Doctrine Confraternity, the Sacred Heart Literary Society, the Guildhall detachment, and the general public. Most of the bodies mentioned above were rosettes, in which the principal colours were the flag—typifying Ireland and Australia. Several handbills were carried, and the various emblems and mottoes, not of a sectarian nature, but expressive of peace and goodwill towards man. Great interest was manifested in the demonstration throughout the city; many places of business were closed, and the streets along the line of route were crowded with spectators. It is computed by Mr. Drill-Instructor George Clarke, that the number of the procession, and its followers, was not less than 12,000 persons, and that it took two hours before the whole had entered the Prince Alfred Park, which was the scene of the principal part of the day's proceedings. The procession started from Hyde Park at a quarter to 11 o'clock, accompanied by no less than five bands: the Artillery band, twelve in number, under Mr. McMahon, the Brigade band, under sergeant Thompson with twelve musicians, the 1st Volunteer Brigade band, under Mr. Bark, with twelve performers, the 2nd Volunteer Artillery band, and the Young Australian band, under Mr. J. Devlin, with twelve performers. The line of route adopted was along Macquarie-street, Bridge-street, George-street, Regent-street, and Cleveland-street, where they entered the Prince Alfred Park by the East Gate. On entrance, the general public being admitted by the Cleveland Gate, the marchers proceeded to the Queen, and thence to the monument, A.D.C.

for the Queen, and three to the memory of O'Connell. The day was a day of vast crowds on the grounds, and the programme was carried out in a most amiable manner. There were several exhibitions, Punch and Judy, and a merry-go-round, all of which were extensively patronized. The several bands performed in different parts of the grounds, and dancing was indulged in to an unlimited extent. By a wise arrangement of the committee no intoxicating drinks were allowed to be sold on the grounds, and as a consequence there was nothing but sobriety and good order and good feeling throughout the day. The force of police in attendance throughout the day, but, as they were, their duties appeared to be altogether of a nominal character. A series of athletic sports was got up in the afternoon, the principal events of which resulted as follows:—Hurdle race, over eight hurdles: First prize, £3; second, £1; won by Hayes. Thompson being second, and Harper a good third. High jump: Prize, £1; won by J. P. O'Connell. Long jump: Prize, 5s; step, jump and running: Prize, £1; won by Guillevy. Shot and javelin: Putting the stone: Prize, £1; won by McTigue. Messrs. J. Carey and J. J. Hayes acted as starters.

In anticipation of the event, the committee made arrangements to have the line cleared, and sent the following telegram to Dublin, to be read at the banquet to be held there under the presidency of the Lord Mayor of Dublin:—
"The Committee of the Sydney and the Committee of the South Wales to the Right Honorable the Earl of Devon, in connection with the Sydney celebration a magnificent success. Monster procession, comprising all classes of community, to Exhibition building. Grand Hibernian concert, and oration by Archbishop Vaughan. P. A. Jennings, K.S.G., chairman. Public banquet on Tuesday. Enthusiasm unprecedented. Australia joins hands with Ireland in doing honor to the memory of the immortal Liberator. Matthew Molony, secretary." J. P. Garvan and T. M. Slattery, hon. secretaries."

The programme was cleared towards dusk, in order that spectators might be made ready for the evening's entertainment. The doors of the Exhibition Building were opened at half-past six o'clock, and a vast concourse of people began at once to pour in, so that in a comparatively short space of time the lower part of the building was well filled; the galleries, which were not opened until some time afterwards, soon became crowded. On the platform were Archbishop Polding, Archbishop Vaughan, the Bishops of Melbourne and Goulburn, Monsignor Lynch, and a large number of clergy; his Honor Mr. Justice Pascoe; Messrs. Hay, Montagu, Abbott, M.L.A.s; Messrs. Anthony Trollope, P. A. Jennings, Dr. Badham, J. G. O'Connor, Curtis, C. Lett, J. P. Garvan, T. M. Slatery, Mrs. Goodenough, Miss Goodenough, Madame Ristori, Mdlle. Ristori, and many other ladies and gentlemen.

The programme was opened with a "grand overture to the most beautiful melodies of Ireland," by the orchestra and organ, which was succeeded by a series of songs and choruses selected from the gems of Irish melody. There was also performed a cantata written for the occasion by Professor Charles Badham, and set to music by Signor Giora. These musical selections were rendered by Miss O'Hare, Mrs. Miles, Miss Dowse Harrison, Miss K. P. Garvan, Mrs. Glynne, Mrs. Glynne, Mrs. Glynne, Mrs. Glynne, and a powerful band. The various pieces were received with much enthusiasm, the performers being frequently heartily cheered. Signor Giora acted as organist, and Mrs. J. P. Garvan ably presided at the organ.

After a few of the musical items on the programme had been given, the chairman, Mr. P. A. Jennings, came forward, and in a few words announced that the Hon. the Archbishop Vaughan, who had kindly undertaken to deliver the oration of the evening,

His Grace the ARCHBISHOP said that he could not cast his eyes upon the vast and distinguished assembly before him, and reflect upon the greatness of the subject upon which he was called to speak, without being deeply moved to the soul's utterance, without being profoundly moved—moved by a feeling of his own inability to do justice either to them or to the occasion. He said that he was not a man of words, even to those interior emotions of his own spirit which he had not the art of conveying in their fullness by means of language. He said that he was not a man of words, even to him on this occasion, and that was the mighty sympathy of his audience, which like a sea of kindness and sensibility surrounded him, and which he felt to be his strength and his endeavor to give expression, in the best language he was able, to these thoughts, feelings, and emotions which were so dear to him, and which he felt to be so dear to them. If he were only able faithfully to reflect their sentiments, and to present before them in living words that which he felt to be the great truth, and the great mission of his age, he should feel so free as to the result. Their sympathy would awaken chords in his spirit, and he, in return, might be able to express and to convey to them the fullness, the vibration, and send a thrill of a never possible into the shrine of their inner hearts. But it might be asked, How can you do this? He said that he had been for 700 years brought so much suffering upon the sister Island—how was it that he, of all others, should stand there on that day, and say to you, as he said to me, as he said to the numbers and friends of the great Daniel O'Connell? And that would say in reply: How could I? And he might say to you, as he said to me, as he said to the numbers and friends of the great Daniel O'Connell? And that would say in reply: How could I? And he might say to you, as he said to me, as he said to the numbers and friends of the great Daniel O'Connell? And that would say in reply: How could I?

"Yes, they would rather homeless roam,
Where freedom and their God's day lead,
Than the elected slave, who, kneeling down,
And subject to the tyrant's reed."

If this was all past now, and we were rejoicing in a brighter and better day, by any reason why our benefactors should be forgotten, I shall not be able to find one. I should sunshine; or it was it wrong of him, should he be judged egotistical, if he took the opportunity of setting this great man before the eyes of his countrymen, and of exhibiting the exemplar of English Catholics, and especially those of his own name? He did then seize this opportunity of acknowledging, and of declaring to the world that he did not know of any man more deserving of notice than he alone, who combined in his own person such statesmanship, such masterful oratory, and such a profound Christianity, as to make him a fit exemplar of the Christian religion, and a personal motive for standing as it were by the Liberator's side, were there not overwhelming motives of a public nature, which would have made it his duty to do so. He was apologizing for the position he occupied that evening at New York; it he had rather to apologise for being so poor an exponent of so great a cause. Not only as a Catholic who had been brought up in the most devoted manner to the cause, he could stand boldly forward, and identify himself with the cause which the Liberator espoused, fight his battle courageously, and stand firm to the end, but as a man of every which he achieved. He must explain himself, in every country, even that which boasts of freedom, and which on the whole has been guided by the enlightened statesmen of the world. There have been two classes of men—despots and tyrants on one side, and the lovers of freedom and fair play on the other. England has been the theatre of the most cruel and unenlightened tyrannies, and the most cruel and unenlightened despots, and has been nourished and bent stung by a line of despots and tyrants, whilst, at the same time, she has produced another race of men, possessed of the genuine spirit of liberty, and ever ready to stand up for the rights of the oppressed. In New, it is according to the English spirit of liberty to name ourselves with tyrants: Is it a want of patriotism to name ourselves with despots? Is it a want of loyalty to us and bringing a stain on her fair name? What he shrunk with horror from the presence of such men as were his country's greatest enemies, he found himself as he parted with them there, as he was in England, surrounded by his great and good—with men who have helped to gain for England the high name she holds for the freedom of the press, and the rights of the subject, and who he extends to her opponents. Yes: England's greatest statesmen and orators, her wisest and poets, were supporting him in his noble mission, and he was surrounded by the brilliant fringes and eloquent advocates, whether with the tongue or pen. He could see Pitt ready to throw out some of his exquisite sentences in favour of freedom; Fox, with his usual ready and unobtrusive manner, ready to produce the highest eloquence, on the point of pouring out a stream of oratory which would make him (the speaker) the most illustrious of men; and he could see the most silver-tongued and inimitable manner would thrill in the ear and settle in the heart, as he would pleased with a power, especially in his own, in favour of the rights of the subject, and the freedom of the press. And did he not seem to see more than this? Besides perceiving this platform, as it were, alive with the great men of old, who were the great statesmen and poets of England, he can see the rough, uncouth form of Dr. Johnson, sitting down, stretching himself, and exclaiming against the brutal tyrants of the day, and the despots of the world; and he can see the smooth, elegant form of Lord Brougham, sitting down, writing away at his Peter Plinley; and Dean Swift, mending his pen with a special point to continue his Draper's Letters, and a whole galaxy of orators, wit, and poets, all ready to stand up for the rights of the subject, and to exert all their talents in honour of the cause which was in bringing his case to a successful issue. He had to gain over, in the face of many a bloody strife, the denials of the millions of his countrymen. England was the great bar to the freedom of Ireland. And England was not only enlisted in her own defence, but she was also the champion of the great industrialists, but she was also strongly actuated by the fact that they were developing themselves abroad. The conditions as regarded the poor were not without its significance. As regards the poor, and the fact that the poor were not as well as the rich. What did O'Connell see in France? His boyish imagination had been stained with pictures of the French Revolution, and the blood of the French Revolution almost touched him as it were when he saw the French Revolution. It was an event which shook like the throes of an earthquake the heart of Europe, and spread consternation in every heart. Louis XVI. was executed, and the French Revolution became attached to the soil, and identified themselves with it, as with Melanchia, but with their own interests, and with the interests of the country, as with Passiflora. Waver after waver of English crossed the channel, and fight after fight took place between the new arrivals and the old. The new arrivals were not content with upon getting hold of as large a portion of booty, as great quantity of the game as their strength and cunning could command; they were not content with the booty, but were not forgetful of themselves, and ever and anon, with the threat of an earthquake, they rose and shook themselves, their chains, and longed to go to Spain, now France, now Italy, and to set the world on fire, and to make efforts to free themselves from the vampire which was sucking the fairness and the plenty of their land. The following items of political gossip have been collected by the Otago Daily Times by its Wellington correspondents:

"Sir George Grey is undoubtedly one of the best speakers in the House. He will be no mean opponent to the Minister. His much remarked depression of his intention to resign has produced a great effect on the public mind, and a great admiration for them, did not much affect the public mind."

SPECIAL ADVERTISEMENTS.

those respects. His memory is worshipped as specifically political and religious grounds, and its celebration is none the less a party act, because many join in giving their tribute on account of some things he did which they approve. Nor can it be said that the procession was divested of a political character, because distinctive badges, flags, symbols, bands, or tunes were suppressed. The essence of the Act is not altered by the removal of these addenda. In fact, the very advice given to suppress these addenda was in itself a condemnation of that which was thus in the interest of order shorn of its external characteristics.

The last paragraph of Mr. DALLMAN's opinion seems to us virtually to admit the whole case. If the Act was passed to secure the preservation of the public peace—to meet the cases of associations "which are supposed by many persons" to partake of a political character, and to prevent malicious or misguided people from endangering the peace by the revival of religious and political distinctions, then it was passed to prevent a public person in honour of a man who is actually regarded both by friends and foes as the champion of the Irish Catholic party.

What cause us to regret what has happened, and the semi-official countenance that has been given to it, is this—that we shall have more of it, and that a fresh apple of discord has been thrown in our midst which was by no means what our community wanted. Friday passed without disturbance, but we shall see over with Friday night? Will not the be other attempts to make as light of the law, or even to sail as close to the law?

Will the respectable citizens who have themselves to the one procession be placed to see other the equally respectable citizens lending themselves to a rival procession?
We cannot at present see where this thing will stop, and yet the very purpose of the Party Processions Act was to keep down
this source of mischief.

W. S. in this colony may learn something from the debate which took place in the House of Commons a few months ago on the motion for the second reading of the Burials Bill. With the exception of a little unseemly joking on the part of a member who appeared inclined to be merry over so serious a subject, the discussion, although involving questions of religious difference, was conducted in a spirit of moderation. The Burial Bill, the second reading of which was moved by Mr. OSBORNE MORGAN, was introduced in the interest of the Nonconformists, opposed by the friends of the Established Church, and rejected on a division of 248 to 234. It was explained by the mover that the bill would confer no new right of burial because Nonconformists possessed already to the fullest extent the right of interment in parish churchyards; and then it was remarked that no one but a Church of England clergyman is permitted to read the burial service in parish churchyards, and hence is not permitted to bury any other persons than those of the Church of England. The bill was rejected, and the subject is England, there are 531 places in which Nonconformist churches have been provided, portions of which have been set apart for Nonconformist use (as in our own cemetery at Haalem Creek) and where similar restrictions do not exist. But it was also remarked that in England and Wales there were between 12,000 and 13,000 parishes containing many millions of inhabitants in which the parish churchyards are the only places of interment, and in these places the remains of a Nonconformist cannot be buried only by a Church of England clergyman according to the rites of the Church of England, to which in his lifetime he had refused to conform.

As Mr. MORGAN observed:—“You could not compel him when living to go to the parish church, but the moment the breath is out of his body the law allows you to lay hands on that man and impose upon him ministrations from which, in life, he would have recoiled."

It was urged, as an objection to the bill, that it would give greater liberty to a Nonconformist minister than was possessed by ministers of the Establishment; but then it was indicated that the restrictions of the latter were not imposed by the Nonconformists, but by the Church and its hierarchy. It was also put forward, as an objection, that the concession would be likely to lead to disorder and mischief; but in reply to this it was asserted that the right now asked for had been conceded in Ireland without causing any of the alleged consequences ensuing. It must be admitted that a concession of this kind is not a very small one.

grave and ecclesiastical battle, but it may be safely affirmed that the rejection of this bill has not delayed for a single week that progress which has already been commenced in the direction of disestablishment. The right was asked for on behalf of England has been conceded in relation to Ireland, and, as the mover remarked, it was a poor compliment to Englishmen to conclude that they were not thought worthy to be entrusted with a privilege which Irishmen had enjoyed for seven years, and of which not a single instance of abuse could be alleged. In an eloquent peroration, the mover remarked that the rejection of the bill would proclaim to the country "that death which heals all other differences was powerless to heal those between Christian and Christian, and, worst of all, it would fasten upon the Church of England the unworthy, he had almost said, the odious imputation under which no Christian Church should lie, of turning a deaf ear to the mourner and refusing to bind up the broken-hearted." It was argued by the hon. member who seconded the motion that the injury done to the Church by the "scandalous" scenes which had occurred was out of all proportion to the extent of the grievance, and he concluded that the members safely trust the good sense of the people to bury their dead, without abusing the "privilege" conferred upon them. Faneuil the burgess of the deceased regarded as a "privilege" to wear a black dress. Lester moved that the bill be read a second time that day six months. He denied that there was any real grievance to remedy, and thought that honorable members ought, as far as possible, to avoid anything that tended to promote the odium theologium. He saw from a Parliamentary paper published the other day that there were no fewer than 120 sects of religionists, but this fact did not even suggest the tyranny of granting sepulture to them only on condition of a conformist service. He "could very well conceive the confusion which would arise at a funeral of a Mormon elder, attended by twenty or thirty widows howling in concert or in dissonance ;
